Abstract

A world with increasing and interrelated crises (pandemics, wars, climate change, natural disasters, increasing social inequality and digital violence) poses new challenges for risk prevention and risk education.

The world-leading Japanese model of disaster risk reduction (DRR) and the approach to promoting disaster resilience through education provide answers to these questions. However, what are the similarities and differences between the Japanese model and the European approach to developing a culture of safety through education and in educational institutions? And how do young people in particular perceive the current global crises? How do they deal with crises, how do they recover from crises and how can they and their institutions prepare for future crisis experiences?

The event offers an open forum where we would like to discuss these questions with you. A video competition will take place before the event to enable young people to participate more actively.
